WHY DO WE HAVE PHYTOSANITARY REGULATIONS?

The current regulations are intended to safeguard the European Union against numerous diseases and parasites harmful to humans, animals and plants.

They apply to all animal or animal-origin foodstuffs, products of animal origin, plant-based foodstuffs, plants and minerals.

Products of animal origin can carry bacteria that can cause infectious diseases

Due to the risk of introducing these types of disease into the European Union, imports of animal-origin foodstuffs are subject to very strict veterinary checks and procedures.

All animal products that do not comply with these rules must be relinquished on arrival in the EU for official disposal.

Any undeclared products will be confiscated by the customs services and destroyed and you will have to pay a fine.

Plants and plant-based products are possible vectors of contamination

Certain plants and plant-based products (fruits, vegetables, plants, flowers, etc.) are possible vectors of contamination from harmful organisms.

They are therefore subject to a compulsory phytosanitary inspection when they enter the European Union.

There are nevertheless a few exceptions on condition that the imported product meets certain conditions.
